Spruce Pine Hollow Park

George Washington rode past here along the noted 18th century Warm Springs Road which went from Alexandria, Virginia to the country's first spa in Berkeley Springs another 12 miles west.

The Meadow Branch of Sleepy Creek, which runs nearby, shows archeological remains of a mill run. Steamboat inventor James Rumsey's brother Edward owned this land and legend has it that this is the site of a bloomery and sawmill. James Rumsey eventually held patents on more than a dozen innovations for mill machinery.

In 1784, Washington contracted with Rumsey to build him a house on Washington's lots in Berkeley Springs. The boards for the structures Rumsey eventually built may have been sawed at this mill.

The Tuscarora Trail, a 252-mile, four-state sidebranch of the Appalachian Trail marked by light blue blazes, crosses WV9 a short distance east of here. The 33 miles in Morgan County extend about 3 miles along River Rd. from where it meets US 522 at the bridge across the Potomac River then south 4.5 miles through woods on dirt and paved roads to the east side of the Meadow Branch on the western boundary of Spruce Pine Hollow Park. From this point follow the blue blazes south climbing more than 1000 ft. up Sleepy Creek Mountain on old logging roads through the wilderness of Sleepy Creek Wildlife Area, passing four campgrounds and Sleepy Creek Lake.

The sawmill took fire in the night and was not discovered until the next day by which time the mill was entirely consumed with a great part of the plank and this stroke put it entirely out of my power to proceed with your large house and notwithstanding utmost exertions at other mills to get the stuff necessary.
